

Nuno Santos has over twenty years of work experience as an economist with both the public and private sector. Before joining the Investment Centre, he worked in the global equities division of Deutsche Bank, as a research consultant with the OECD Development Centre and with the Colombian think-tank Fedesarrollo. Since joining FAO's Investment Centre in 2006 he has led teams in the design, supervision and evaluation of rural development projects financed by several international finance institutions such as the World Bank, IFAD, EBRD and IDB. He has authored and contributed to publications and supported projects on topics such as food security, agricultural taxation, producer support estimates, value chain development, rural finance, agricultural cooperatives, greening of agrifood systems and irrigation. More recently, Nuno has worked mainly on sector studies and related policy dialogue for agribusiness sector development and greening of agrifood systems. Nuno holds a bachelor's degree in economics and econometrics from Nova University, Portugal, and a master's degree in international development from Harvard University.
